Charles Hoehn, a retired US Marine, was introduced to the Healogics Wound Care Center® in Indiana due to a blister on his right foot caused by an improperly fitting insole. The blister had a hard time healing because of his type 2 diabetes, and eventually became a chronic wound. An infection in his bone was also discovered. Charles tried other treatments with no results and his doctor feared he might lose his leg. Hoping to save his leg, Charles' doctor sent him to a Healogics Wound Care Center. The team at the Center developed a treatment plan for Charles that included hyperbaric oxygen therapy (HBOT).

HBOT is a treatment in which a patient breathes 100 percent oxygen inside a pressurized, acrylic chamber. This allows blood to absorb more oxygen and transport that oxygen to the wound and help the healing process. After his course of treatment, Charles was healed and returned to his primary care physician for monitoring.

During his treatments at the Center, Charles grew very close to the staff. He shared his love for John Wayne movies with the HBO Tech, and now considers all of them a part of his family. Although he was unfamiliar with HBOT in the beginning, he is now confident in the treatment after witnessing his healing transformation.

Charles and his wife, Judy, are now able to live life to the fullest. Charles is able to cut the grass again, as well as help Judy plant flowers in their garden. They enjoy taking vacations together knowing that Charles' wound is healed and his leg was able to be saved.
